

BUILDERS HAVE PLANS FOR NUMEROUS NEW RESIDENCES.

WASHINGTON TIMES BUREAU, ANACOSTIA, D. C., JUNE 2.

Building operations in Anacostia are on the increase, as is indicated by the permits that have been issued for new structures and for improvements to existing ones.

Max Simon, of southwest Washington, the owner of premises 1929 Nichols avenue, the quarters formerly occupied by a general nature, has caused a complete remodeling of the brick structure to be made, and it will be utilized, in part, for business purposes.

Gilbert J. Osterman will shortly commence the erection of two houses on Fourteenth street, between W and Valley streets. The two brick buildings under construction for James Dore, on V street, are about completed, and will be occupied in a short time.

Extensive improvements have been made to the premises owned by H. L. Osterman, 151 Maple View avenue, and improvements of a general nature have been completed by Mrs. Emma Wilson, 315 Chester street, and William Cator, of the same section. Charles Lewis is having a frame residence built at Fourteenth street and Valley place. John C. King has finished extensive improvements to premises 2213 and 2215 Chester street. Plans have been placed in the hands of builders for the erection of a number of new residences.

A local enterprise that has been inaugurated this season under improved conditions in Anacostia is the Anacostia ice plant, located adjacent to the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, near Shannon street. The men who are at the head of the company this year are Charles Linstrom, who is the manager; Edwin H. Towse, and Frank Lindenberg. The company has installed new equipment.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Linger and family, of Good Hope road, have returned from a trip to Frederick, Md., where they were the guests of Henry A. Linger.

Logan Park, the public square in Anacostia, situated between V and W streets, on Fourteenth street, has been placed in readiness for the public concerts, which the Engineer Band will inaugurate here this evening.

Dr. Henry W. Miller, who was clinical director at the Government Hospital for the Insane, has accepted a position as the superintendent of an institution for the care of the insane in Augusta, Me., and yesterday he departed for his new field.

Work on the extension of the big sewer leading from Bridge street to the channel of the Eastern Branch, is progressing rapidly under the direction of the Engineer, which expects to complete the contract within a short time.

THE BLUE OCEAN LIGHTER

Synopsis of Chapters Already Published
Hiram Hubert, and his daughter, Susan, whose mother is dead and who had been entirely on her father's ship, often sailing, indeed, one day, as he sailed for Boston on the ship Hiram and Susan, from Bordeaux. The crew turns out to be a bad one, especially the boatswain, Francois, who has been robbed for insulting Susan. The only reliable man is the mate, Mr. Conant, who is secretly in love with the girl. They are attacked by a British frigate, the time being the American Revolution. During the engagement, Francois, taking advantage of the confusion, steals the captain in revenge for being flogged.

CHAPTER VII. The Reticent Mate.

STANDING above on the poop, Susan saw the deed, but her scream went unheeded in the confusion. "Do you strike?" came down again from the frigate.

The smoke had blown away by this time, and she was close aboard. Mercifully, her captain held his fire.

No response came from the American ship, and he could see that she was practically helpless.

The boatswain, after a defiant look at the dead captain, wiped his sweat-knife on his trousers, jumped lightly over the captain's body, and ran up the poop-ladder.

Susan thought he had come for her. She was too unnerved by the terrible catastrophe that had befallen her to think of resistance. She shrank back against the rail and looked at him, horrified. Her fingers fumbled at her pistol.

"I'll tend to you presently, my beautiful," he cried, "but first I must take the deck, cast off the halyards, and haul off the United States flag from the mast."

As it reached the deck he stamped his foot upon it.

"How dare you!" cried Susan, awakened by the sound of the pistol and ran toward him. Quick as a cat he sprang upon her, and with the weapon out of her hand, hurled it into the sea, and threw her wildly from him.

"I'm master of the ship now," he said. "The captain's dead, killed by the enemy."

"You killed him," said the girl. "I say, 'Nonsense,' was the reply. 'Where is Mr. Conant?'" asked Susan. "He's on the forecastle."

"Heave to!" cried a voice from the other ship.

"Aye, aye, sir," answered the boatswain. "As for you," he said, "turning to Susan, 'you'd better get below.' Without a word, Susan turned and entered the cabin.

"I'll send your father after you," said the man, as she left the deck. "But don't you think to have things entirely his own way, for Mr. Conant at this juncture made his appearance in seriousness, and came aft at a steady, but apparently master of himself."

"What's this?" he said, as he stepped by the body of Captain Hiram. "The captain was killed, sir," answered the boatswain, smoothly, descending to the quarter deck, "my first broadside from the English frigate."

"My God!" exclaimed Conant. "And Miss Hubbert?"

"She's below in her cabin, and unharmed, I think," returned the boatswain.

"Two of you carry the captain's body to the cabin," said the mate. "Who surrenders the ship?"

"I did, sir," answered the boatswain, lifting his knife.

The first who clambered through the gangway was a tall, slender, erect, authoritative-looking young man of perhaps five-and-twenty, dressed in the blue-and-white British navy uniform, which he wore with ease and dignity. The single epaulet upon the shoulder indicated that he was a lieutenant in his majesty's service. He wore the usual sword, pistols and cocked hat.

Hard on his heels came a bed-ridden youngster, a midshipman, evidently, and following them a dozen seadogs armed with cutlasses and pistols.

Followed by the midshipman, the officer turned and spoke to the boatswain spread themselves about the deck, in obedience to the quick directions of a boatswain's mate. Two went to the forecastle; the others occupied indicated stations, one old seadog relieving the man at the wheel.

Mr. Conant, from his station on the poop, saw no more of the British officer, who with brisk steps and an air of great nonchalance, rapidly mounted the ladder.

"Are you the captain of this ship?" he began.

"No, sir," blurted out the mate, "but I am the officer in charge of the ship."

"I told you once," growled the mate, "that I was the officer in charge of the ship."

"Will you pardon my excessive stupidity?" he said, "I wish to inform you who and what you are?"

"None of your business!" roared the mate. "I am the officer in charge of the ship."

"Indeed! Mr. Merryfield—this to the midshipman who had stood by impatiently, through the interview."

"Will you kindly ask the boatswain's mate to send Johnson and Palmer—I believe they are the two stoutest men in the crew—up on the poop?"

The midshipman was only too glad to transmit the order, to which the two seamen, who had responded with alacrity. The performance had been very tame, so far, and they were hoping for something more to do.

"And that the mate's ill temper might continue."

"Perhaps," said the officer, pointing to Conant, "these worthy fellows may assist you to answer my courteous questions with proper civility. If you do not, although I am not averse to using the force, I shall have to order you taken to the fore-cabin."

An angry snarl was the only reply. "Now, Messrs. Palmer and Johnson, two of the burliest tars that ever trod a ship's deck, ranged themselves about the mate, and the boatswain's mate, the officer Johnson drew his pistol."

"Now, sir," began the former, "you perceive the seriousness of your situation. Who abandons the ship?"

"What is your name?"

"Conant,"

"Oh! Mr. Conant, charmed to make your acquaintance, although the circumstances are not altogether favorable for unreserved intercourse."

"I am the captain of this ship," he said, "and I am the officer in charge of the ship."

"I told you once," growled the mate, "that I was the officer in charge of the ship."
